As a practical application of the speaker's argument, Martha Schofield said she desired to introduce the Sloyd system of industrial training for young children into her school at Aiken, S. C. and expressed the faith that the $500 needed to do this would come to her from some source.

Matthew Anderson, principal of the Bureau industrial School in Philadelphia, said that the colored population in that city has increased 23,000 in ten years, and that the newcomers are the most worthless of the Southern negroes; the philanthropists will need to study the new problem that thus confronts them:
